COMPANY "C" 104TH ENGINEERS — CAMP McCLELLAN — ANNISTON, ALA. — FEB 9th 1918

FOREWORD

THE purpose of this little brochure is to make available for the members of Company C and those who take a special pride in their glorious achievements, the official records of the Company's movements and principal occupations during its active campaign in France, in such form that it may be conveniently preserved and afford a ready reference.

The material herein is not intended to be anything more than a mere outline of the Company's history. Linked up with the bare facts now available are many personal experiences and incidents of individual heroism and hardships all of which must be collected and correlated and worked into the main fabric before the full story can be told.

No doubt a thorough and complete history, and one which will do full justice to the patriots of Company C, will some day be written. Until this time it is the hope that the facts contained in this little booklet may serve some useful purpose.

Capt. Geo. W. Mulheron Lieut. F. D. Woodruff
Lieut. C. B. Harveson Lieut. L. S. Whippen

HISTORICAL SKETCH

OF THE many chapters that will make up the history of America's achievements in the war, none will be more brilliant and inspiring and reflect a greater degree of patriotic zeal than that dealing with the part played by Trenton's Own Company of Engineers. Enjoying the distinction of being a volunteer organization brought into existence shortly after the declaration of war with Germany, and with a record of valuable service rendered to the Government at the great cantonment of Camp Dix, and finally crowned by a record of gallant conduct while overseas, it would be hard indeed to pay a tribute commensurate with the distinguished service which will forever be a monument to the glory of these patriots.

Company C was recruited by the Engineers Club of Trenton in response to an urgent request from Adjutant General Barber that the Club undertake the formation of such a unit with all possible haste. With the prospects of a formidable conflict ahead, and a crying need in the State Militia for a Battalion of Engineers, no time was to be lost in supplying the deficiency. Companies were being organized in Newark and Camden and these, together with the Trenton unit, were to form the Battalion for which there was such an imperative need.

By the middle of April, 1917, the Club's efforts were in full motion. A call for volunteers was issued and spread broadcast about the city, and every means of bringing the undertaking to the attention of the men of the community was employed. The response was generous, but owing to the great percentage of rejections on account of physical defects, the work of bringing the Company up to its required quota proved an arduous task. However, nothing was to be thought of but success and in this spirit the work was prosecuted.

Great credit is due to Captain George W. Mulheron and Lieutenant Carlton B. Harveson (since promoted to the rank of Major) who were chosen by the Club to command the Company, for their untiring efforts in the work of recruiting. To them is largely due the credit for the success with which the Club's efforts were finally crowned. Of course, it was realized from the outset that a large part of the responsibility of success would necessarily rest on the shoulders of those who were to receive the Club's indorsement as officers of the Company. The provision that officers in the National Guard must be elected by a vote of the men made it necessary, if the Club's choice of officers was to be sustained, that those selected to command the Company take an active part in the work of recruiting and establish a close personal contact with their men during the period of the Company's formation. The unselfish spirit in which Captain Mulheron and Major Harveson responded to the Club's call and fulfilled the responsibilities which their selection imposed upon them, cannot be too highly commended. Acknowledgement must also be made to the many members of the Company whose co-operation played such a large part in the final success of the project.

The election of officers proved the faith of the men in Captain Mulheron and Lieutenant Harveson, who, with Lieutenant Woodruff and 2d Lieutenant Whippen, both of whom had the indorsement of the Club and were well equipped for Engineer officers, were chosen by the men of the Company as their staff of commissioned officers.

For a short period prior to its movement to Camp Dix, the Company was quartered in the Armory where it was assembled at frequent intervals for drill and discipline. On June 1st, 1917, a small detachment was sent to Wrightstown to commence the work of surveying and mapping the site preparatory to laying out and constructing the great cantonment which was later to play such an important role in the training of the draft army for overseas duty, the first contingent of which was to arrive on September 1st. These men were the first troops to establish themselves in the great Camp and this distinction is very keenly cherished by the men of Company C. On June 26th, the entire Company was assembled at the Camp and permanent headquarters established.

The Company remained at Camp Dix for three months during which time it rendered indispensable service in the discharge of the many duties incident to the development of the Camp. Supervision of the construction of roads, railroads and the many utilities that go to make up a modern soldier city, checking of materials of construction and keeping time of a vast army of workmen, comprised a large part of the routine of the men of Company C during this period. And so efficiently did it discharge its duties, that upon its departure for the south, the Commander of the Camp, Major-General Kennedy, saw fit to express himself by letter upon the excellency of its work.

On August 5th, 1917, all of the organizations of the National Guard were Federalized and by this procedure Company C, together with the other companies of the Battalion, lost its status as a National Guard unit. The change thus brought about occasioned considerable speculation as to what would be the ultimate fate of Company C, as little was known of what disposition the Government would make of the former units of the Guard. It was rumored at the time that the companies might be broken up and the men assigned individually to other units, and this prospect was anything but pleasing to the men. But the Company was not to suffer any such fate, as future events proved.

Early in August a number of the members of the Engineers Club journeyed to the Camp to present the Battalion with the Engineer Colors. The flag was turned over with fitting ceremonies, President of the Club, Fred C. Carstarphen, making the presentation on behalf of the Club, and Major Frederick A. Reimer responding with a speech of acceptance. The flag was carried by the Battalion and by the 104th Regiment until shortly before its departure for France, when the regimental colors were supplied by the Government, and there being no further use for it, it was returned to its donors. It was the general expectation that the flag would be carried overseas, and the fact that it was not occasioned some disappointment. However, on account of the associations which it brings up, it is none the less prized by the members of the Club and will be preserved and cherished as a memorial to the gallant men of Company C.

After three months of valuable service at Camp Dix the Company received orders to entrain for Camp McClellan, Alabama, on October 3d, 1917. Considerable disappointment on the part of the folks at home was caused by the sudden and unexpected removal of the men from Camp Dix, without an opportunity being afforded of bidding them a farewell. An eleventh-hour effort was made to have their train shunted to Trenton enroute, but the War Department, to whom the appeal was made, remained immovable and the departure was executed as per schedule.

At Camp McClellan the 29th Division was in process of formation and the three companies which originally comprised the N. J. Engineer Battalion formed the groundwork upon which was built up the divisional Engineer Regiment, the 104th Engineers. The companies were raised to full war strength of 250 men and many changes in the personnel of the officers were effected. Company C came out of the shuffle with all of its original officers transferred to other companies and a staff of strange officers in their stead. This proved disappointing not only to the men of the Company but to their many friends at home who had hoped that the Company would retain its identity as a strictly local unit. However, this was only the beginning of Company C's experience in this respect, for in the course of its career it was destined to have no fewer than seven different Captains and as many junior and senior Lieutenants.

For eight months the men went through intensive and rigid training preparatory to overseas service. Finally, the 104th Engineers received its orders to embark and on June 14th, 1918, left Camp McClellan for the port of embarkation at Hoboken. On June 17th the Regiment sailed for France on the U. S. S. Northern Pacific. The voyage was uneventful with the exception of a submarine scare which occasioned considerable amusement among the men who were assembled on deck with their life preservers, only to find that the supposed submarine was nothing more formidable than a stray buoy. Following a ten days' voyage the Regiment arrived at Brest, France, on June 26th, 1918. After a short stay at Brest, during which time the Company was employed in the construction of docks, the Regiment moved inland on July 5th, travelling by train to Maatz where it arrived on July 7th, and Regimental headquarters were established. Company C was billeted at Coublanc, a small town about a half mile from Maatz. Here the Company was employed in drill and discipline for about ten days, after which it moved to Giromagy, about fifteen miles in the rear of the southern sector of the Alsace front, arriving there on July 18th. At Giromagy the men were drilled in Infantry tactics and the use of the gas mask.

Group of Co. C men in abandoned German Trench.

The great German thrust to Paris which was at its heighth about this time, made it imperative that every available combat unit be rushed into action at once, and so, when the 32d Division was moved north from a quiet sector of the Alsace front to engage in the great counter offensive of the Allies, the 29th Division was hastily shifted to occupy the lines which the 32d was leaving. When the 29th Infantry and machine gun units took up their positions, the companies of the Engineer Regiment were distributed over the divisional area. Thus, on July 25th, Company C went to Fulleren, a small town a few miles from the lines in the small section of Alsace recaptured by the French.

After several days of dugout digging, the Company was given the "delicate" little task of clearing the dense undergrowth from the "field of fire" of our front line. Of course, this was "No Man's Land," but the lines,being in a heavy wood, the Company seldom even got a sight of the enemy. Work progressed favorably for several days with no interruption until one sunny morning in August the Company realized it was war after all.

German machine guns had pushed up during the night, with the intention of wiping out an entire working platoon of Company C as it went to work on the following morning. However, a patrol was sent in front of the main engineer body and the "nests" were discovered before the entire platoon was in range. In the engagement which followed, Kenneth C. Price, of Burlington, a member of the advance patrol, was killed, being one of the first in the entire division to pay the supreme sacrifice. Robert Flack, of Newark, was missing and two additional men were severely wounded. Prompt action by the platoon prevented the Boche intentions from being fulfilled, and they were forced to a hasty retreat.

The day following this experience (August 8th) Company C left Fulleren for Badricort and Hagenbach, two small villages about two miles apart, a few miles north of Fulleren and directly behind the front-line trenches, half of the Company going to each place. From here a picked detachment of the Company under Lieutenant E. B. Miller was detailed to Retzwiller, about three miles west of the positions of the main Company, to go into training to cooperate with the divisional Infantry raiding parties. This platoon left on August 10th.

On August 30th, after a stay of about three weeks, the Company left Badricort and Hagenbach for Novillard, about twelve miles in the rear of the lines, for a rest period of two weeks.

Meanwhile the platoon which was detailed to Rotzwiller was experiencing some hazardous work. Three groups were sent out to assist the Infantry raiding parties. The first raid, owing to a lack of proper reconnaissance, failed to reach the enemy trench. The second raid, conducted by the 115th Infantry, reached its objective. Perhaps a complete and detailed account of this raid will never be told. No one member of the party was in a position where he could observe the entire action, and, owing to the darkness and the intense excitement of the moment, it is doubtful whether any of those who participated grasped very much of what was going on about them. Lieutenant Miller's report of the raid, which is taken from Company C's official records, and which is no doubt based on the fragmentary accounts of those who were fortunate enough to return without serious injury, is as follows:

"The Artillery fire was very effective, completely demolishing the wire. The Engineer detachment led the raid, eight men going with each party while Sergeant Haring, as leader, guided both from a position slightly in front and between the groups. Not knowing how effective the Artillery had been, both Engineer parties rushed forward with Bangalore torpedoes the minute the barrage lifted. Just as they reached the trenches high explosive shells began dropping around them. A sniper hit Corporal Bloor, who was leading the right-hand party, and he fell to one side, saying: "Go on, finish it." A few feet further a shell hit one of the torpedoes or close enough to explode it. A few minutes later Private Ryan recovered consciousness and after uncovering the part of himself, which was buried beneath dirt and debris, he began searching for the remainder of the party. He first found Private Paul, who, like himself, had just recovered consciousness. Together they searched the surrounding ground. Private Bauer was found apparently killed by the concussion. The remains of another body, which they took to be Private Volk, was close by. Continuing their search they found two wounded infantrymen whom they assisted back across "No Man's Land." Snipers were very active, but they managed to get back without further casualties. Private Ryan had received a slight flesh wound on his right leg and Private Paul apparently had had a close escape when a piece of shrapnel carried away a small portion of his left ear. Of the left-hand party only the Infantry suffered heavy losses. When the return signal had been given they started back. Not an Engineer returned who did not assist a wounded man back with him. Private Winegar and an infantryman, while helping one of the wounded out of an abandoned trench, were both hit by a sniper, a ball passing through both thighs of the infantryman and lodging in Private Winegar's leg."

In this action Company C suffered its greatest loss. Robert B. Volk, George J. Bauer, Spencer Bloor and John F. Doherty were killed, while James W. Haring and Benedetto Rappa were seriously wounded, and James T. Ryan and John Winegar received wounds of a less serious nature.

The third raid, conducted by the 113th Infantry, like the first, was unsuccessful. That the failure, however, was in no way due to the Engineers who participated is attested by a statement of the Infantry Lieutenant in charge: "Had the party been all Engineers the raid would certainly not have been a failure."

After its period of rest at Novillard, Company C moved to Elbach, on September 13th, and back to Novillard on September 21st, where the Rotzwiller detail rejoined the Company. With four of its members killed and several others missing on account of serious wounds the reunion was indeed a sad one. On September 23d the Company left Novillard for Belfort where the entire Regiment departed on trains leaving the Alsace sector.

In the Alsace area most of the movements of the Company were made by hike and the work of the men consisted principally in the following operations:

1. Clearing field of fire for machine guns.
2. Constructing dugouts and light shelters.
3. Building machine gun emplacements.
4. Repairing barbed wire entanglements.
5. Erecting barbed wire entanglements.
6. Receiving training in demolition.
7. Accompanying Infantry on raiding parties, demolishing wire and other obstructions in advance of the Infantry.

On the 26th of September the great Meuse-Argonne battle commenced and toward the end of the month the 29th Division was relieved and hastily moved north to a point about thirty miles south of Verdun, where it was held in reserve. On September 28th the conditions of advance made it necessary to order all Engineer troops to the lines at once and the 104th was detached and rushed to Avocourt where two days previous the 37th and 91st Divisions had started their drive forward.

The entire unit was immediately placed on what may, perhaps, be called its most important work of the war—the building of a road across a "No Man's Land" of four years' standing, which had held the Crown Prince at bay in 1916. Continuous rain had made conditions such that the entire advance depended on the upkeep of the roads as the guns, munitions and supplies had to keep up with the steadily-advancing fighting units a few miles ahead. While traffic jammed and pushed ahead in miles and miles of closely-packed trucks, guns, ambulances and wagons, the Engineers worked day and night to relieve the congestion.

Former German positions and stone emplacements along the Boche lines within a half mile of the road, were broken up and carried by the men through narrow paths to the road.

Finally, on October 5th, having worked night and day for a week, with nothing to eat but what could be begged from nearby ration dumps, and in other ways suffering indescribable hardships, conditions were such as to permit the Regiment to move back a few miles for rest.

On the 8th, the 29th got its call, and, crossing the Meuse river by a hastily thrown pontoon bridge, attacked the strong German positions on the commanding heights of the east bank, about eight miles from Verdun. The 29th, with the 33d on the left, and the 26th on the right, together with French troops, was shoving at the hinge of the great German line, which was swinging back before the tide of the Allied armies from the pivot of Verdun to the North Sea.

Prussian and Bavarian shock divisions were rushed to the defense, and resistance was stubborn at every foot.

Meanwhile Company C, after but two days of rest from its exhausting experience at Avocourt, was moved to Brabant where, for twenty days (October 8th to October 29th), the Company worked on the Brabant-Danvillers road, directly behind the front-line positions of the sector occupied by the 29th Division. During this period it rained nearly every day and the men slept in abandoned trenches on damp ground. A day's work lasted from daylight until after dark and the men were given little opportunity to make themselves comfortable. Breakfast and supper were eaten in the dark. There were many gas alarms, the men being awakened several times every night to put on their gas masks. The work was shelled continuously day and night, and it was a streak of rare good fortune that none of the men were killed and but few wounded or gassed.

On October 29th the Division moved back for rest and replacements, Company C going to a rest billet at Sommelonne. During the trip to Sommelonne, which was made partly on foot and partly by truck, a number of the men of the Company had an experience which they have reason not soon to forget. The truck in which they were riding was the last one of the convoy and the driver losing sight of the truck he was following took the wrong road at a cross-roads and was driving straight back towards the lines when the sound of the guns and the bursting of shells about them convinced the men of their plight. Unable to make the driver, who was a French Hindu-Chinese, comprehend the situation, the men used the best persuasion they knew of, a pistol, and one of them took the front seat and directed the movements of the truck. The course of the truck was reversed and on the return, by rare good luck, the party came across a French officer in a Ford, who was one of the French Lieutenants in charge of the convoy and had been sent back to locate the lost truck. After a wild ride in which the Ford led the way the men reached their destination only ten minutes behind the convoy.

The signing of the armistice removed the prospect of any future combat service, and on November 18th the Company left Sommelonne for Blondefontain, where it was to remain until April 26th, 1919, at which time its movement homeward began. With the war virtually at an end and the thoughts of the men turned toward home the five months during which the Company remained here proved wearisome and tedious. The time was spent mostly in drill and repair of the roads in the divisional area, but the work had lost its former interest.

Finally the word to move, which had so long been anxiously awaited, came on April 26th, and the Regiment entrained for the port of St. Nazaire where it arrived two days later.

On May 11th the men embarked for home on the U. S. S. Manchuria, arriving at Hoboken on May 22d. The Regiment was assigned to Camp Merritt for the usual sanitary inspection after which it was moved to Camp Dix for demobilization. On May 26th, a date long to be remembered by the folks at home, the 104th Engineers, which had made such an enviable record, paraded in Trenton enroute to Camp Dix. These bronzed crusaders sent a thrill through all who saw their triumphant procession and the occasion is one which will hold a prominent place in the memory of their kinsfolk and many friends.

On May 28th and 29th Company C was disbanded and the men were restored to civilian life from whence they had come in the spirit of true patriots over two years before. And thus comes to a close the record of a valorous unit of Engineers whose strenuous efforts and painstaking regard for detail kept open the lines of communications for the forwarding of munitions and supplies to the irresistible American troops that smashed the German lines and captured the impregnable Argonne forest. Indeed a record of which we are all justly proud.

Headquarters 104th Engineers
General Orders American E. F.
No. 5. 3 March, 19.

1. The following letter of comendation from the Chief Engineer, American E. F., is published as his appreciation of the work of the 104th Engineers:

"American Expeditionary Forces
Headquarters Services of Supply
Office of Chief Engineer, A. E. F.

From: The Chief Engineer, A. E. F.
To: Commanding Officer, 104th Engineers.
Subject: Letter of Commendation.

1. Before issuance of definite orders for your regiment to return to the United States, it is my desire that the command be advised that they have met the conditions imposed by the conflict just concluded in a most satisfactory manner.

2. The duties performed by your regiment north of Verdun and in organizing the front line positions with the 57th and 58th Infantry Brigades was important. The excellent road work of Avocourt, which was performed under heavy shell fire, was of the highest importance to the success of the first Argonne drive.

3. I desire that you and your command know that the services rendered were highly satisfactory and deserve commendation.

W. C. LANGFITT,
Major General, U. S. A."

2. This splendid appreciation of the performance of the regiment when it was tested is a tribute to the good work of all that had a part in its training and preparation for service, as well as those that served during the period mentioned. To all it will be an incentive to be worthy of a high reputation.

FREDERICK B. DOWNING,
Colonel, Engineers.
